Kirkpatrick Quitting CIA To Teach

Lyman B. Kirkpatrick Jr., executive director and controller of the Central Intelligence Agency since it was founded shortly after World War II, is resigning to become a college professor.

Kirkpatrick will join the faculty of Brown University in Providence, R.I., as a professor of political science in September. The effective date of his resignation was not disclosed but Kirkpatrick is still serving with the CIA.

His departure from the agency leaves a vacancy in the number three job at CIA and is the latest in a series of resignations from ranking posts in the Johnson administration.

Kirkpatrick, an affable, gray-haired man, is known throughout official Washington by the wheelchair he has been forced to use since an attack of polio crippled him in his adulthood. Last year President Johnson presented him with the Distinguished Civilian Service Award in a White House ceremony.

Brown University said that Kirkpatrick will teach a course on operational aspects of the Cold War and later a course on national security.

A native of Rochester, N.Y., he is a 1938 graduate of Princeton University. During World War II, he served on the staff of Gen. Omar N. Bradley in Europe. Before that he was on the staff of U.S. News, now U.S. News and World Report.
